NPRA

Message from NPRA's President

Energy is a risky business. With growing demand fueled by a strong global economy and worries related to hurricanes, geopolitical tensions and adequate supplies, these turbulent times have made energy security a major challenge facing the U.S. oil and gas industry. Now more than ever industry needs the strength, knowledge and leadership to shape a secure energy future.

NPRA is there to help make the refining and petrochemical industries we serve stronger and better. One way we do is by sponsoring world-class meetings where information is exchanged and best practices shared. The 2007 NPRA Annual Meeting – now in its 105th year – will kick off March 18-20 at the Marriott Rivercenter Hotel in San Antonio. The theme of this year's meeting is "Shaping a Secure Energy Future."

As we enter 2007, the Democratic leadership in the House and Senate will change the legislative landscape, but energy policy will remain squarely on the agenda. There is little doubt that the oil and gas industry will face heightened scrutiny from the adoption of punitive measures such as price gouging legislation to the roll back of tax incentives and a greater focus on increased incentives for the development of alternative fuels.

Now more than ever you can learn more about these challenges by attending the NPRA Annual Meeting. This year's line-up of high profile speakers features leaders

Bob Slaughter
President

from business and government including Rudolph Giuliani, Chairman and CEO, Giuliani Partners, Bruce Smith, Chairman and CEO, Tesoro Corporation, John G. Rice, Vice Chairman, GE, Carolyn W. Merritt, Chairman & CEO of the U.S. Chemical Safety Board, and Dr. Michael A. Pacheco, Director of the National Bioenergy Center of the National Renewable Energy Laboratory.

NPRA's management and technical sessions are among the most comprehensive in the industry, covering strategic issues such as crude oil supply, refinery/petrochemical plant integration, supply/demand outlook for crude oils and products, and organizational issues as well as the process technologies, catalysts, and equipment. This year there are new sessions focusing on your evolving business needs, including energy; capital projects and turnarounds; and health and safety. This strong technical program is designed to help NPRA members meet the challenge of shaping a secure energy future.

This year's Issues sessions will again target those issues critical to your business. "Strategies for Navigating the New Legislative Landscape" will focus on the agenda for the 110th Congress and its implications for both industries. "Facility Security: Grappling with New Federal Mandates" will address implementation of new facility security regulations. "The Biofuels Promise: Fact or Fiction" will cover the outlook for incorporating ethanol and other biofuels into the transportation fuel system. And "Clearing the Air: Implications of NAAQS and NSR" will anticipate the challenges of implementing the new NAAQS rule and NSR reforms.

You should attend the meeting to learn about important public policy issues, to hear about the latest technical developments and to forge strategic new directions. Don't miss the opportunity to be involved and make a difference. See you in San Antonio!
